And he admitted that, "above all, we sometimes tend to take for granted a relationship as important and deep as the one between France and the United States." as he spoke in a perfect fluent french to the Journalist."There is now a very important opportunity ... to deepen this cooperation and coordination, whether in the Sahel, in the Indo-Pacific, or on transatlantic issues," Blinken said. As a high level Top diplomat, Antony Blinken, then added and commented the diplomatic and strategic approach of alliances and the sense of partnership: "If we define engagement as how many troops you have in such and such a place, that's one question," Blinken parried. "If we define engagement by what your diplomatic, political, and economic engagement with your allies and partners is, then I believe that we are very committed." Eventually, there was no spectacular announcement of any new France-US efforts, coming out of 5 October's meetings. It was just a matter of defining the next steps for the two countries ahead of the real meeting of Presidents Joe Biden and Emmanuel Macron by the end of October during the G20 in Italy. Meanwhile, Antony Blinken promised closer consultation on key national security issues facing France, such as the stability of Africa's Sahel region and the renewal of NATO. Source: France Tv2
